It's time to add a meaningful title

unnecessary words

When I look back on myself, I feel proud to have the opportunity of having different experiences where I can learn from. Learning is a process that I will go through along my life and the choices I make. However, learning can also mean learning by text or by others' experience. There are multiple ways of gaining knowledge, I learn by situations at school, with friends and by reading.

Focus on how you learn instead of insisting what's best for others. I learn! Make these ways of learning more specific.

One of my best ways to learn is by required presentations that teacher have given to me. When a presentation in front of a classroom happens, I always feel nervous, I must prepare myself from all the different emotions and those stress a hundred percent I would feel. For this presentation, I had to present about a social impact, and I chose to research and deliver information about how parent's decisions affect children. I learned current information which I had never heard. I saw numbers known as data; it showed me percentages of how kids do not have a successful future because certain decisions parents have. This event stands out to me because it increases my knowledge about what is happening in my surroundings. It also helps to expand my vocabulary and the way things are on the outside. It improves my skills to inform my peers about the impact children are having. Aside from this, I love it when I finish presenting because it gives me a sort of satisfaction from not being in front of the class. The lesson is that I learn how to manage my emotions and let myself know that you must put yourself outside of your comfort zone to grow. I put myself in a vulnerable position, I still do it and confront my fears while it lets me grow personally allowing me to complete more of my goals that include managing with myself and my emotions.

Focus on you!

Another learning experience is by reading diverse types of books or websites. I feel different feelings when I read, I have end up crying and laughing. I love to read romance fiction books and non-fiction books. I think reading has helped me to learn about other ethnicities, how other families are with each other, and how others go through diversity. Reading about a book named "A Long Walk to Water" taught me to be more empathic toward people in order countries and learn more about their culture, opinions, and their problems. This book is about a kid surviving from scarcity. Most of the time, we think we are going through a tuff time. However, if we really go in depth about different problems the world has, our problems will be diminished. This has made see things from a different point of view. Take the opportunities and advantages that you have because while you can, there are others outside that do not have that option. It is ~~impact on my life is that~~ since I have read this book, I tend to appreciate the things that happen to me because they upskill my understanding about different things.

How do you make sure you appreciate things daily?
What actions do you take?

My third way of learning is from my friends or people that are close to me. My group of friends are different based on their personalities. It is what makes us unique. They also have different beliefs because we all are from different countries. There was a time were discussing how we say a word in Spanish in our countries. ~~We all had diverse ways.~~ One of my friends said in Venezuela, banana is called cambur. Another friend said that in Dominican Republic is called guineo while I said that in Spain, we called it platano. We were in shock at how multiples ways we can call one thing and start saying words we thought were common for us but for others it is not. It showed me the diversity we have in this country and how we should appreciate our culture. ~~The impact it had on me~~ was to create more consciousness about other countries and languages. We might all talk Spanish however we have our own unique way to call things, and it makes us proud of our ethnicity.

More conscious of the diversity around you on a regular basis?
How are you making yourself how?

These experiences and endeavors teach me about myself that I must persevere and learn new things because it will help me grow in multiple ways and get me prepared for more challenges I would like to upfront in the future, also that our minds are powerful. I enjoy learning, it is great to have that urge to learn and know about things outside of our world. It might be based on experiences or other diverse ways. Gaining knowledge about distinct cultures and languages is also helpful to expand our understanding of multiple things. At the end, the best way to live life is by learning.
